The bill allows families and individuals to obtain health coverage through a federally run health insurance marketplace. It also holds insurance companies accountable for profits and benefits that they charge the federal government. The bill expands Medicaid for low-income individuals and funds community health centers. In states that expand Medicaid, the federal government will pick up about half the cost of the program for three years. But senators must now determine whether to approve or amend the legislation that is currently being debated in the House. ADVERTISEMENT Here's a quick look at what's in the bill, according to the Congressional Budget Office. Expanding Medicaid The bill would extend Medicaid, the nation's largest health insurance program for low-income and disabled individuals, to about 11 million people. Under the plan, states would be required to extend coverage to individuals who earn no more than 138 percent of the federal poverty line, or about $16,640 for an individual. Medicaid would be expanded to cover more childless adults and pregnant women, and to more low-income families. The CBO says that under the bill, the federal government would pay for about 86 percent of the expansion by 2022. Under current law, states can choose to expand Medicaid by adopting the provisions of the Affordable Care Act. The state of New York is planning to expand Medicaid under the ACA, and about 13 other states have made similar plans. The House on Thursday passed its own health care bill, which would have expanded Medicaid to cover some childless adults and people with income below 82157476af
